Contents

Acknowledgements ix
Notes on Contributors x

Part I Introduction

1 Making Sense of Identity Discourses in International Events, Festivals and Spectacles 3
  Udo Merkel

Part II The Contestation of Local and Regional Identity Discourses and Communities

2 Il Calcio as a Source of Local and Social Identity in Italy 37
  Mark Doidge

3 The Contestation of Identities and Communities in German Football 54
  Udo Merkel

Part III Identity Discourses of Cities and National Communities

4 Contemporary Images and Identities in the Hong Kong Dragon Boat Festival 75
  Brian Bridges and Glos Ho

5 London 2012: Urban Imagery and City Branding 96
  Adam Jones

6 Royal Celebrations in the Twenty-First Century: ‘Cool Britannia’ versus ‘Britannia Ruled the Waves’ 116
  Beth Mudford

7 Identity Discourses and Narratives in North Korean Events, Festivals and Celebrations 135
  Udo Merkel and Gwang Ok
8 China and the World Fairs (1915–2010): Blending Nationalism and Internationalism
   Lu Zhouxiang

Part IV Supra-national Events, Communities and Identity Discourses

9 Promoting ‘European’ Identities at and through Pan-European Events
   Jayne Luscombe

10 Celebrating Muhammad’s Birthday in the Middle East: Supporting or Complicating Muslim Identity Projects?
   Andrea L. Stanton

11 Pride and Glamour on the Catwalk: Fashion Models as National and Ethnic Icons
   Patricia Soley-Beltran

12 Participating in the World ‘Gymnastics For All’ Festival, the Gymnaestrada: A Celebration of a Dialogical, Episodic-Perpetual Identity
   Angela Wichmann

13 ‘One But Not the Same’: U2 Concerts, Community and Cultural Identity
   Michael Williams

Index

260
1
Making Sense of Identity Discourses in International Events, Festivals and Spectacles

Udo Merkel

This edited collection is concerned with international festivals, celebrations and spectacles, as well as the contributions these events make to our social identities. More precisely, it is about two distinctively different and yet interrelated processes: the construction and presentation of identities. It also explores the intersections of identity and community within various event contexts. The book's interdisciplinary approach, cross-cultural themes and methodological diversity reflect the complexity of its overriding issue that appears to be en vogue in the realms of everyday discourses, popular culture, journalism and academia. In a nutshell, identity refers to the understanding of individuals in terms of who they are, normally in comparison to others. This ability 'involves knowing who we are, knowing who others are, them knowing who we are, us knowing who they think we are, and so on' (Jenkins 2008, p.5). Jenkins also notes that planned events, in particular rites and rituals, play an important role in the formation and development of social identities as they tend to celebrate the essence of an identity and mark the transition from one identity to another. However, this volume is less concerned with small-scale or personal private celebrations that consolidate identity than high-profile, international events, festivals and spectacles.

In February 2014, two global sports spectacles, the Winter Olympics in Sochi and the Super Bowl in New York, attracted global media attention not only because of the sports but also due to their explicit engagement with identity discourses. Although Sochi's elegant and creative display of Russia's past, present and future in the opening ceremony was commended for its modest patriotism, there were also concerns about the extravaganza’s historical accuracy, a number of serious omissions and a tendency to romanticize and glamourize the country’s social and political structures (Walker 2014b). Overall, however, the Russians’ attempt to demonstrate to the rest of world who they were, who they are and who they want to be in the future was widely praised. In comparison, Coca Cola’s one-minute commercial during the Super Bowl caused a serious stir, particularly among conservative political commentators. Over 110 million viewers saw an advertisement that can be described as neither innovative nor original. It commenced with a man on a horse wearing a cowboy hat, reflected, visually, on the rich social, cultural and ethnic diversity of the United States in the main part and finished with children running towards the Grand Canyon. All of this was accompanied by a rendition of ‘America the Beautiful’, a patriotic tune that many consider to be the unofficial national anthem of the United States. However, it was sung not only in English but in eight other languages, specifically Arabic, French, Hebrew, Hindi, Keres, Mandarin, Spanish and Tagalog, symbolizing American diversity (Younge 2014). The televised commercial sparked angry, controversial and ugly comments on social media sites such as Facebook and Twitter, suggesting that Coca Cola’s understanding of America’s identity is misguided, a threat to most Americans’ sense of who they are and a misrepresentation of core American values. Others, particularly members of minority ethnic groups, were outraged that they had been appropriated as a marketing tool to increase corporate profits. There were also questions as to whether the company’s attempts to legitimize the Americaness of minority groups should be praised or taken as an insult. After all, the global corporate giant has been frequently criticized for its disregard for fair working conditions, health and environmental concerns.

3

Debates about modern identities and membership in local, regional, national and international communities not only are part of popular culture but have also become more intense and systematic in the academic world. Donald Getz’s comprehensive and thorough study, ‘The Nature and Scope of Festival Studies’ (2010), which examined 423 research papers, argues that the systematic analysis of festivals has grown into a significant field within events studies. He concludes that academic accounts of international festivals are dominated by three overarching themes: the socio-cultural roles, meaning and significance and the relationship between festivals and tourism and management issues. A closer look at this meta-literature review reveals that the issues of identity and community feature frequently as subheadings in various sections, for example in the context of papers concerned with authenticity, place and attachment, and social and cultural impacts. Therefore, it appears to be fair to suggest that a key characteristic of local, regional, national and international events and festivals alike is their contribution to the formation and expression of identity discourses and narratives. Many events and festivals confirm and reinforce identities, whilst others question and challenge traditional identities; some help to modify and reshape established identities, whereas others generate new identities or intend to reposition existing identities. Identity formation processes explicitly motivate some festivals and events; for others, it is an unintended by-product. With the help of symbolic systems and signifying processes, events and festivals create and offer distinctive meanings, which help individuals to form communities and make sense of who they are. These socio-cultural processes define and shape both individual and collective identities and have done so for some time, as the following three examples will show.

The 1969 Woodstock Festival of Music and Art was a memorable gathering of around a half million young, like-minded US citizens. Most of them questioned mainstream American norms and values, opposed the Vietnam War, supported the civil rights movement, wore unconventional clothes, explored alternative lifestyles, such as communal living, and experimented with sex and drugs. The festival caught the attention of the world as its essence was rooted in and combined music, social responsibility and independent, alternative forms of thinking. But, more importantly, Woodstock defined, shaped and expressed the identity of a new generation of young people, the Woodstock Nation (Hoffman 1993). Although the organizers of Woodstock were neither hippies nor civil rights or anti-war activists, the event brought together and united the energies of various counter-cultural streams, the anti-Vietnam War and pro-peace movement. Woodstock experienced the birth and 'christening' of a new identity that offered a different sense of social belonging inspired by a reflective and dynamic relationship between music and citizenship. After the worldwide release of the soundtrack and the film about the event, in 1970, Woodstock became a key source and important reference point for all those who believed that solidarity with other young people around the world would lead to fundamental socio-political changes. As such, the Woodstock Nation slowly turned into Woodstock Transnational (Kramer 2013).

In sharp contrast, football fans in the various European leagues tend to be more conservative and traditional and do not necessarily challenge political but commercial forces. The event, that is the frequent matches of their respective teams, plays a crucial role in their desire to express their identity and experience a sense of community. These occasions provide unique and valuable opportunities for the celebration of distinctively local, sometimes regional, identities. For many traditional fans, attending a football match is about experiencing and expressing a sense of belonging through the emotional engagement with other like-minded fans. The uniform outward appearance of many fans provides a clear expression of their identity, displays their community membership and a sense of belonging (Finn and Giulianiotti 2000; Giulianiotti 2002; Merkel 1999; Ward and Williams 2010). Their vocal rejection of the increasing commercialization of football and their fight to preserve and maintain traditional, often very masculine, values and cultural practices are not driven by an anti-capitalism agenda. It is primarily about ownership, community and identity issues that are threatened by commercial forces that have repeatedly shown a total disregard for the social significance of football matches, clubs and teams.

Traditions play an equally significant role in the third example that demonstrates the close relationship and intersections between events, identity and community formation. In November 2013, Brazil’s Amazon region hosted the 12th Indigenous Games with more than 1,500 participants from various South and North American tribes and countries (Dana 2013). Some competitions focused on physical strength, agility and endurance. Others drew on important hunting and survival skills of the participants, for example archery. A very small number of activities revealed modern influences, such as football – albeit players were not allowed to run but had to crawl along the ground and could only use their heads to push the ball forward. Of course, this indigenous festival appears to be an unconventional and low-profile alternative to the sporting spectacles in Brazil, the 2014 FIFA World Cup and the 2016 Rio de Janeiro Summer Olympics. However, this coming together of traditional tribal cultures offered these dispersed communities with limited contacts to the outside world a rare chance to interact with each other, unite, celebrate and reflect on their identities.

This trio of examples clearly confirms that identities are social constructs. Their formation occurs within specific socio-economic, political and cultural contexts. They are the outcomes of social interaction and can only be understood properly in relation to the social environment, in particular in relation to other identities and communities. Jenkins argues that ‘identifying ourselves, or others, is a matter of meaning, and meaning always involves interaction: agreement and disagreement, convention and innovation, communication and negotiation’ (2008, p.17). Consequently, he has repeatedly suggested abandoning the ‘social’ in event. These occasions were not only occasions to celebrate of festive times, but also opportunities for people to gather, express a shared sense of belonging and reaffirm community membership (Giulianotti 2000; Giulianiotti 1997). Such identification and social rejection of ‘outsiders’ have often been a means of seeking to preserve and reinforce the norms, values and cultural practices that the community holds as primary about what it is to be ‘local’. (Giulianotti 2000, p.77) The above-mentioned short case studies also raise a significant number of questions about the relationship between events, identity discourses and communities, which this volume intends to explore in detail:

1. What kind of sources do events, festivals and celebrations provide and what kind of input do they offer for both the construction of communities and the expressing of their identities? How do events support the formation of identities? How do they build social capital and foster community spirit?

2. What kind of identity projects do events support? Do they help to preserve and reinforce established identities and communities, or do they challenge them and offer a platform to launch new and alternative identities?
3. What are the specific characteristics of identities and communities that emerge and exist in the context of international events? What do events say about the identity of their participants?
4. How do we best theorize those communities that share a distinctive identity? Are concepts that are derived from classical sociological thinking still able to capture the essence of these communities or are modern, often contested, conceptualizations more useful?

In order to facilitate a better understanding of this collection, I will address some of these issues and questions briefly in this introduction before they are considered in much greater detail in the individual chapters.

Theorizing identity and community: Influential thinkers and thoughts

Although, currently, there appears to be an urgency and preoccupation with questions of identity, academic debates about the significance and changing nature of identity and community have permeated the development of social-scientific thinking and analyses for more than a century. These discussions can be traced back to the origins and early days of both German and French sociology. Some of the most influential, innovative and groundbreaking thinkers, such as Karl Marx, Émile Durkheim and Ferdinand Tönnies, had a keen interest in the way people create communities and form social identities on the basis of a strong sense of shared interests, characteristics, values and beliefs, and reinforced through a variety of cultural practices and rituals. Despite their very different approaches to the study of identity, all agreed that a collective consciousness, which defines membership in, and the solidarity of, a group, is developed through action and interaction of individuals. It creates social integration and holds these communities and, ultimately, society together.

Karl Marx (1818–1883) was primarily interested in the impacts of fundamental socio-economic changes, the emergence of industrial society, the development of capitalism and the dynamics of the new class system. Due to his concern about growing social inequalities, he paid particular attention to the formation of a working-class consciousness, one of the many outcomes of the industrialization process in European societies in the nineteenth century. Although Marx did not use the term ‘identity’, he introduced the sociological concept of class consciousness and differentiated between a ‘class in itself’ and ‘class for
I asked myself, could communities form through social events? What is the meaning of community?

In short, they are a distinctive form of social cohesion. Communities or at least some of them are for me a continuing issue.

Before concluding, I will summarize what I have said in this introduction, but mainly for the individual thinkers.

Thinks of thinkers

The problem of the preoccupation with the nature of social cohesion, which permeated the work of the first generation of sociologists and early social theorists, was most influential to the work of Karl Marx, Émile Durkheim, and the way people think about the nature of a strong social cohesion and reintegration. Despite their differences, they agreed that a collective sense of solidarity and the cohesion of individuals is essential. Nonetheless, and...

Durkheim was deeply concerned about the new socio-economic structures that the industrialization process had created could lead to a disintegration of society. Although he was aware that the increasing population size and growing division of labour had created robust networks of interdependencies, he considered the weakening of a collective conscience to be a serious challenge for modern societies. In his seminal work, The Division of Labour in Society, originally published in 1893, he concludes that social cohesion takes different shapes in particular historical eras (1997). He developed a simple dichotomy to mark the two ends of a continuum that illustrates the transition from tradition to modernity. Durkheim's differentiation between 'mechanical solidarity' and 'organic solidarity' describes two types of social organization and the ways individuals are connected.

Mechanical solidarity is characterized by a low division of labour, based on likeness, shared sentiments and responsibilities, a high degree... of self-sufficiency and close personal ties. All these elements constitute a simple, pre-industrial version of social cohesion that is crucially supported by religious rituals and ceremonies. In The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, initially published in 1912, Durkheim (2001) has also shown how important rituals are for social cohesion, solidarity and a collective consciousness. He argued that rituals stimulate the experience of collective effervescence, which, in turn, promotes a group identity, strengthens the sense of belonging and stresses the symbolic boundaries between insiders and outsiders. In sharp contrast, organic solidarity is typical for more complex, socially differentiated and secular societies with a higher division of labour that requires more cooperation and collaboration. People are no longer connected to each other by close personal ties and traditions but by their reliance on each other. They have lost the ability to be self-sufficient and become mutually interdependent because of the increased division of labour and subsequent specialization. Rights and responsibilities are increasingly linked to individuals, rather than collectives. Durkheim further concluded that although the modernization process had destroyed the traditional bonds and ties that defined and created the mechanical solidarity of the people, it had been replaced by a different set of social relations and connections that created organic solidarity.

Ferdinand Tönnies (1855–1936) observed similar developments in German society and developed two conceptual tools that tried to capture the changing principles of social life and group cohesion. He distinguished between Gemeinschaft and Gesellschaft (1887), which are frequently translated as ‘community’ and ‘society’ (or ‘association’), respectively, in order to account for fundamental changes that affected the social organization of individuals in the aftermath of the Industrial Revolution. Gemeinschaft refers to a group of individuals who consider the interests and needs of the group at least as important as their own. Such a community tends to share fundamental values and beliefs, which guide and regulate the cultural practices and social responsibilities of all members with reference to each other and the group as a whole. A typical example of such a Gemeinschaft is the family, which often offers a distinctive sense of loyalty and identity. Other examples include tight-knit, exclusive, religious communities whose members have simple face-to-face relations and share a common belief system, language, traditions, rituals and routines. The status of individuals is ascribed and based on membership of this group.

Unlike the Gemeinschaft, the term Gesellschaft describes a social arrangement in which individuals’ self-interest takes precedence over the large group or association. In Gesellschaft-like structures, secondary relationships are more important than familial or kinship ties and are largely instrumental. A modern business is well suited as an example as the different stakeholders (owners, managers, employees and so on) tend to have very little in common. However, all of these stakeholders have a keen (self-)interest in making a living, earning money and ensuring that the company continues to provide such opportunities. Such a socio-economic system rarely generates a genuine and intense sense of identity and loyalty. It is therefore more prone to conflicts and tensions. In order to combat such problems and to increase an individual’s commitment in Gesellschaft-like structures, currently, corporate identity strategies seek to forge artificial group bonds and a sense of belonging that are typical for a Gemeinschaft. Furthermore, the status of individuals in Gesellschaft-like social structures is usually based on their personal achievements, for example through work and education, and not ascribed as in Gemeinschaft-like social systems. Very similar to Durkheim, Tönnies also argues that social consciousness and cohesion in more advanced societies are the outcomes of an awareness of one’s dependence on others rather than likeness and similarities.

Despite the lasting impact of Marx, Durkheim and Tönnies’s ideas, modern and contemporary theoretical debates about identity and community have become more complex, increasingly differentiated and more contested. They also reflect fundamental shifts in the way research and theories try to capture these issues, particularly in the context of international events, which constitute very specific, often unique, usually highly condensed and always liminal experiences. More recently, substantial contributions to the analysis of community and identity issues have been made by Benedict Anderson (1983), Eric Hobsbawm and Terence Rangers (1983), Anthony Cohen (1985), Michel Maffesoli (1996) and Kevin Hetherington (1998) – to name just a few of those whose ideas and theories underpin the case studies in this collection.

Benedict Anderson’s work on Imagined Communities (1983) and the origins and spread of nationalism is widely regarded as seminal. His conceptualization of modern nation-states as imagined communities acknowledges that a sense of belonging to a national community does not depend on face-to-face interaction or relationships between members of that collective. He suggests that this sense of belonging to a nation is socially constructed and imagined. In other words, members of a national community are brought together by the image of their communion.
The nation is imagined as \textit{limited} because even the largest of them, encompassing perhaps a billion living human beings, has finite, if elastic, boundaries, beyond which lie other nations. No nation imagines itself coterminous with mankind... It is imagined as \textit{sovereign} because the concept was born in an age in which the Enlightenment and Revolution were destroying the legitimacy of the divinely-ordained, hierarchical dynastic realm... Finally, it is imagined as a \textit{community} because, regardless of the actual inequality and exploitation that may occur in each, the nation is always conceived as a deep horizontal comradeship.

(Anderson 1983, p.7)

Anderson’s exclusive focus on the role of literacy and the reproduction and representation of the nation through the print media reveals a somehow narrow understanding of culture. There is no doubt about the historical significance of printed media products. However, national, and other, identities can be imagined and experienced in a variety of ways and contexts, such as architecture, particular clothes, food, music and festivities.

Anderson’s understanding of imagined communities implies that nations can be reimagined and transformed. Therefore, national identities are flexible constructs and prone to change over time and able to adjust to new circumstances. ‘Nations are what their citizens imagine them to be, and nation-building occurs not only through political and economic processes, but also in cultural and symbolic contexts’ (Farquharson and Marjoriibanks 2003, p.45). In this regard, international sports events are frequently referred to as important forums for these kinds of processes. However, other international events, festivals and spectacles are, at least, equally useful and influential as they provide important sites for the modification of identities. Even though Anderson’s concept is the outcome of a thorough analysis of the development of modern nationalism, it is now used more broadly and in a variety of contexts as it can be applied fruitfully to other groups, communities and identity projects.

Eric Hobsbawm and Terence Ranger’s seminal book \textit{The Invention of Tradition} (1983) complements Anderson’s account. This classic text argues convincingly that many of the traditions and customs that we perceive to have a long history are, in fact, relatively recent inventions. Hobsbawm defines the title and focus of this edited book as ‘a set of practices [...] of a ritual or symbolic nature, which seek to inculcate certain values and norms of behaviour by repetition, which automatically implies continuity with the past' (1983, p.1). Like the customs of pre-modern societies, modern invented traditions have symbolic functions and convey important social meanings that have been reduced to rituals, symbols and festive occasions. Furthermore, several chapters clearly illustrate how rituals and symbolisms have been created to be part of various national cultures meeting important emotional needs. At the same time, many of these invented traditions support the spread of fundamental ideological messages. Although the collection of essays focuses on Britain and the British Empire, Hobsbawm suggests in the introduction and in the conclusion that the findings of the individual case studies can be applied to other Western nations. In the last chapter, Hobsbawm stresses the close links between the invention of traditions and the development of nation-states and spread of nationalism during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. However, invented traditions were not only used to justify the existence of states but also employed to create social cohesion and a sense of community by other institutions and organizations, such as political parties and the trade union movement in various countries. Hobsbawm and Ranger's focus is upon how the powerful invent traditions and rituals that create the illusion of continuity, instil a sense of belonging, legitimize existing power structures and reinforce common norms and values. Although the concept of ‘invented traditions’ is very useful and applicable to the critical study of contemporary international events and festivals, as this collection will show, it is not only the political and economic elites but also ordinary people that invent, develop, consolidate and modify cultural traditions and practices as part of communal gatherings and identity discourses.

According to Anthony Cohen (1985), a community is a meaningful system of cultural practices, patterns and values that provides its members with a sense of belonging and, ultimately, an identity. He stresses that the concept of community entails that members of a collective share a set of common characteristics that clearly distinguishes them from other groups. For Cohen, the concept of community can only be fully understood with reference to belonging and similarity, on the one hand, and differences and boundaries on the other. Both sameness and differences become very visible, and are reinforced, through the setting of boundaries as they protect the unifying elements that define a group’s identity and demarcate it from other collectives. The ‘boundary encapsulates the identity of the community and, like the identity of an individual, is called into being by the exigencies of social interaction’ (Cohen 1985, p.12). Importantly, it is not the boundary as such, but what the boundary means to people, or, ‘more precisely, about the meanings they give to it’ (Cohen 1985, p.12) and how it is experienced that matters in this context.

The persistent interest of sociology, politics and cultural studies in examining and theorising the formation and construction of communities that share a distinctive collective identity has also led to the modification of existing theories and the emergence of new concepts. The French sociologist Michel Maffesoli (1996) introduced the notion of neo-tribes in the late 1980s in the wider context of discussions about postmodernism. The term refers to social communities that people create on the basis of emotional solidarity and in response to the increasing fragmentation and individualization of social life. Whereas, traditionally, geography and kinship defined membership in tribes, nowadays tribes are more fluid and transient and come together for the duration of rituals, performances and special occasions. Their shared emotional solidarity only exists in specific contexts, in a particular period of time and for a specific reason, such as the pursuit of a common interest or the duration of a festival.

Kevin Hetherington evaluated critically the concept of neo-tribes, questioned a number of Maffesoli’s ideas and expanded it in his book Expressions of Identity: Space, Performance, Politics (1998). He suggests that neo-tribes are intentional ‘communities of feeling’ (Hetherington 1998, p.49) and, as such, they offer expressive rather than rational identities. They reveal a ‘troubled politics of identity in which people try to renegotiate their identities’ (p.53). Hetherington also acknowledges that older sources of identity, such as class, gender and ethnicity, continue to influence identity discourses of neo-tribes. According to Maffesoli, however, identities are shaped and constructed through the practices that derive from the chosen focus of the neo-tribes and their emotional ties, but do not arise from the members’ positions in the social structures (p.56). Hetherington also suggests that neo-tribes exhibit their collective identities through distinctive symbolisms and conspicuous styles.

Similar academic discussions about the formation and display of collective styles initially gained prominence in the mid-1970s due to the innovative work of the Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (CCCS) at the University of Brirmingham (Hall and Jefferson 1976). Their analysis of the emergence of youth subcultures and the significance of their styles is framed by Antonio Gramsci’s concept of hegemony (Gramsci 1971) and, therefore, considers youth subcultures as a response to the overarching power structures in post-Second World War Britain. Youth subcultures emerge usually around common leisure activities, social rituals and cultural spaces. They are most visible through their distinctive, often provocative, subcultural styles (Hebdige 1979) that combine a special dress code, jargon, symbols, rituals and other elements. The subcultural style not only reinforces commitment to the group but also displays core norms and values, and forms and reflects the group’s identity. Despite a degree of similarity, there are some substantial differences between subcultures and neo-tribes. Most importantly, whilst the identities of the former are relatively stable, fixed and perpetual, membership of neo-tribes is less static and more dynamic. Opting in and out is as possible as multiple affiliations.

Whilst all the above-mentioned writers have made important contributions to the understanding of the concept and phenomenon of identity, there is hardly any acknowledgement of the contested nature of many identity projects. This is reflected frequently in the controversies surrounding the use of specific symbols that mark and display publicly a group’s sense of who they are. The popularity of the St George’s Cross, England’s emblematic flag, has declined considerably over the last decade after far-right political groups appropriated this symbol. Various polls have shown repeatedly that the St George’s Cross is, nowadays, often associated with exclusionist racist and xenophobic views.

Furthermore, all the theorists discussed above pay very little attention to the mundane and routine displays of identity, for example in everyday life, leisure and popular culture. As several of the case studies in this collection will show, any contemporary and critical analysis of identity discourses needs to take these realms into consideration. Tim Edensor has done this successfully in his book on National Identity, Popular Culture and Everyday Life (2002) that explores ‘the dense spatial, material, performative, embodied and representative expressions and experiences of national identity which are inextricably interlinked with each other, which constitute a shared compendia of resources, akin to a vast matrix into which individuals can tap to actualize a sense of national belonging’ (p.vii).

Many of the theories that frame the case studies in this volume derive from, draw on and/or extend the observations and insights of the above-mentioned theorists. This persistent theoretical diversity confirms the complexity of the issue under investigation and an epistemological truism, namely, that no single theoretical framework can encapsulate the totality of a social phenomenon.
Constructing identities and communities: Traditional and modern sources

In addition to the substantial increase of academic interest in identity issues over the last few decades, journalistic publications and television programmes frequently aim to offer a better understanding of this complex, multi-layered phenomenon. Many of these are keen to solve the contemporary identity crisis that has been caused by the ongoing globalization process, the growing fragmentation and individualization of modern societies and the absence of firm and stable points of reference. Although the existence of an identity crisis is contested, there is little doubt that the widespread interest in identity issues is linked to some dramatic technological, socio-economic, political and cultural changes. These far-reaching developments have resulted in a number of discontinuities and uncertainties that affect our sense of who we are. This book will touch on some of these developments as their impacts can be observed in the complex relationship between international events, festivals and celebrations, and identities, identity discourses and debates as well as the construction and celebrations of contemporary communities.

Although the meanings attached to international events and festivals vary considerably and range from personal to global significance and impacts (Merkel 2014), there is little doubt that they make considerable contributions to the creation of collective and place identities, enhance the participants' social and cultural capital, and offer a wide variety of opportunities to engage in identity discourses. Such an engagement takes various forms. Some events and festivals reinforce traditional identities; others promote identity changes. Some celebrate majority identities; others challenge the normative nature of dominant identity discourses and favour alternative and minority identities. Some are a reminder of traditional identities; others provide a forum for the launch of new identities.

At the heart of all these identity projects lies a fundamental question: Who am I? As already established, answering this question requires active engagement with our social environment. It involves exploring how we see ourselves and imagining how others view us. The creation of identities is a social practice that constitutes the basis for identification with and a sense of belonging to a community of like-minded people. Such groups tend to manifest opposition to the identity of other groups through stressing differences that create boundaries and act as important markers (Woodward 2010). The outcome is quite often a simple differentiation between ‘us’ and ‘them’ that tends to be socially experienced through inclusion or exclusion of individuals and groups.

Whilst a group identity is based on its members’ shared sense of who they are, individuals draw on their biography, their experiences, their social and spatial environments and their interactions with other people. However, identity formation processes are never complete. They are dynamic and fluid, require adjustments to new individual and social realities and have become more complex and multifaceted through one’s life span. We all grow up within specific ethnic, socio-economic, cultural and political environments, as citizens of states and members of national communities, and are, at least initially, shaped by these collectives. In later stages of our lives, we acquire additional identities that may reflect our occupational background, strong religious beliefs, support for specific environmental causes or admiration of sports teams and rock bands with whom we identify. The formation of identities is a continuous process that happens in, and is therefore influenced by, the surrounding social context. The outcome reconciles and integrates the dynamic relationship between the personal and the social. Past and present social structures, however, tend to limit our choices and the control we have over this process of identity construction.

Although the vast majority of modern festivals and events appear to be democratic and inclusive celebrations, below the surface, the space offered for the expression and display of identities can be limited and, very often, prioritize dominant identity discourses. Many events have been clearly gendered throughout their history, often excluding or marginalizing women. Although women tend to be much more visible in, and, occasionally, even the focus of, event settings, their presence often perpetuates outdated and stereotypical ideas of femininity and womanhood. Gender identities are primarily a social and cultural construct. There are, however, a number of tensions between outdated, stereotypical assumptions and modern, emancipatory expectations. This is clearly reflected in the political controversies that frequently surround the hosting of beauty pageants. These competitions tend to perform very traditional gender identities that are frequently contested as they reinforce stereotypical, Western conceptions of womanhood, celebrating beauty and sexual attractiveness.

Since their inception over 150 years ago, these competitions have attracted opposition and protest. Feminists argue that these events are shallow and superficial, show a close resemblance to livestock competitions at country fairs, reduce women to the sum of their parts, are symbols of the hyper-commercialization of beauty and, most importantly, signify the oppression of women. In 2002, when the Miss World competition was to be held in Nigeria, over 100 people were killed in violent clashes after a newspaper article, written by a Christian journalist, suggested that Prophet Mohammad would have selected a wife from among the contestants. Many Muslims felt insulted by this publication, which caused a further deterioration in the already tense relationship between the Christian and Muslim communities and resulted in three days of rioting. A year later, Indonesian Muslims voiced their discontent about the Miss World event due to take place in Bali. They argued that this pageant celebrated a gender identity that promoted sexual indecency. Even more contested are child beauty pageants that have grown considerably in popularity over recent years in a large number of countries. In France, in 2013, a clear majority in the Senate decided to ban beauty pageants for children under the age of 16 as these events, it was argued, promoted a hyper-sexualized identity among young girls.

Equally important for the formation of identities are economic structures, in particular patterns of employment and the distribution of wealth and power. Social class has traditionally offered people a firm sense of who they are and an important means of class distinction. More recently, and largely due to substantial socio-economic and cultural changes such as the continuously high levels of unemployment, the decline of traditional large-scale manufacturing industries and the erosion of work-based community cultures, class as a source of one's identity has diminished. Some commentators even argue that in modern, Western societies, class, as a social category and identity source, has become obsolete and been replaced by a variety of consumption-oriented lifestyles that, nowadays, make more significant contributions to the formation of people's identities. Although this claim of the fragmentation, disintegration and disappearance of traditional working-class identities is not new, it implies two noteworthy fundamental changes. First, there has been a shift from collective to individual identities, and, second, consumption practices and non-work activities, such as leisure priorities, have become more important and influential than occupational background. Despite these claims, there are still a large number of events that celebrate class membership and conspicuously display the group’s class identity and social background.

The Viennese Opera Ball is one of these. It is held annually at the State Opera in Austria's capital and is the climax of the ball season, which runs from January to the end of March. Most members of Vienna's middle class attend at least one of the 300 or so balls per season, many of these hosted by specific trades and professions. However, the Opera Ball is World competition is staged in violent conflict, an event that generated significant resistance among the young. The competition, which is traditionally held each year, involves the selection of three days of events, culminating in a grand finale that is widely perceived as a legendary and exclusive celebration of upper-class culture. Whilst the vast majority of the attendees come from the worlds of business and commerce, the event also offers politicians, socialites and celebrities a red-carpet opportunity. The proceedings usually commence with a traditional initiation rite. The first to take to the dance floor are the ‘Debutants’ in their white ball gowns. This occasion marks the debut these young women give to the assembled Viennese upper class. In essence, this is an event that allows Viennese high society and aristocratic circles to relive the monarchial spirit, reinvigorate the decadence of previous centuries and class identities and structures.

Another powerful source of identity is ethnic background, which is the focus of and rationale for several events and festivals all over the world. The extension and proliferation of ethnic identities over the last 50 years is, again, a clear reflection of some dramatic social changes that have led to discontinuities and uncertainties. Among these are the steadily growing labour migration and the emergence of many multicultural societies that have witnessed social tensions due to the increased ethnic diversity. Although the Notting Hill Carnival is nowadays one of London’s most popular tourist attractions, its early history and roots, which go back to the late 1950s, clearly show that this event played a major role in the construction of alternative black identity discourses in Britain’s capital. It was, originally, an attempt to promote a distinctively different Afro-Caribbean identity and to challenge widespread, often racist, perceptions of black migrants in British society.

Although I do not wish to engage in a discussion about the contemporary centrality of class, gender and ethnicity (Woodward 2000) in the context of identity discourses, I would suggest that they cannot be ignored as they continue to intersect with other identity dispositions. That also applies to one’s national background as a source of identity. Although the ongoing globalization process is undermining territorial definitions of modern societies due to considerable increases in migration, the question whether this process also leads to the end of modern nation-states remains contested. However, there is little doubt that we, as individuals and groups, continue to draw on the nation-state as an important point of reference and a relatively stable ingredient of our identity. The political elites of most countries promote a sense of national identity through the provision of a multilayered web of national symbols and signifiers, such as flags, anthems, emblems, ceremonies, rituals, role models, heroes and heroines. Hosting major sports events and participating in high-profile international competitions is often driven by the desire to offer national communities... a distinctive sense of who they are. This happens most frequently in the world of international sport that is primarily concerned with the production and, often emotional, consumption of national differences. Rowe (2003, p.285) even suggests that ‘sport’s reliance on passionate national differentiation and celebrity is so thoroughgoing as to question its suitability as an exemplar of global culture’. So far, research into the relationship between events and national identity has been dominated by a focus on high-profile international sports events, often in the wider context of globalization debates (Armstrong and Giulianotti 1999; Kelly and Brownell 2011; Merkel 2006; Price and Dayan 2008; Schaffer and Smith 2000; Smith and Porter 2004; Sugden and Tomlinson 1994; Tomlinson and Young 2006). However, more recently, other events and festivals, highlighted in Commemorative Events (Frost and Laing 2013) and National Days (McCrone and McPherson 2009), for example, have started to feature more prominently on the research agenda. National Days are specific (holi)days to remind citizens of who they are. They are usually used as ‘commemorative advices in time and place for reinforcing national identity’ (McCrone and McPherson 2009, p.1). However, similar to the lavish Olympic opening and closing ceremonies, these occasions also provide valuable opportunities for a country to convey to the rest of the world who they are, what they believe in and what they are good at. Some National Day celebrations do happen not only ‘at home’ but all over the world, such as the St Patrick’s Day parades and festivals. Not only do they reflect the Irish diaspora, geographical detachment from the nation-state, growing cultural confidence and a sense of pride and achievement, they have also become powerful marketing tools to promote Ireland as a holiday destination.

Whilst the influence of some of the above-mentioned identity sources, particularly gender, class and ethnicity, appears to be less stable and powerful than in previous decades, others, for example one’s sexual orientation, have become more public, powerful and influential and created new identity discourses. They are also at the centre of several events and festivals that aim to increase awareness and acceptance of a variety of different sexual identities and, at the same time, fight the discrimination of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) people. Most notable among these LGBT events are Pride events. They range from small-scale commemorations, rallies and community days to large dance parties, parades and well-known international festivals, such as the ones in Berlin, Brighton, Madrid, San Francisco and Sydney. All of these events have in common the fact that they publicly proclaim pride in their identity. Although many of these events have nowadays developed a much broader appeal and attract an increasing number of attendees from outside the LGBT community, for sportsmen and women to be open about their gay identity is still not common, often problematic, and the issue has regular influence on sports events.

Discussions about the appropriateness of homosexual lifestyles and identities overshadowed the run-up to the 2014 Winter Olympics in Russia’s Sochi. The introduction of some controversial legislation banning ‘propaganda of nontraditional sexual relations’ among young people in Russia caused an international outcry and some fierce criticism from all over the world. Although Russian President Vladimir Putin repeatedly offered assurances to gay athletes and fans attending the 2014 Sochi Winter Olympics (Walker 2014a, p.20), there were calls from various groups to challenge these controversial laws through a boycott of the Olympics. The American president, Barack Obama, sent a clear message to Russia by appointing two openly gay athletes as official representatives. It is, of course, not the US president’s reaction to discriminatory laws in Russia that is key but the fact that identity issues matter considerably in the context of international events and festivals, and can even cause tensions, conflicts and, potentially, disruptions.

Challenging, resisting and contesting identities

Some of the above-mentioned examples have already demonstrated that identities are contested. Resistance to dominant identity discourses tends to come primarily from two groups: ‘those whose identities are not recognized – that is, accepted as legitimate and respected by it; and those whose identities are recognized but marginalized or inferiorized. Each involves a different discursive strategy and political struggle’ (Parekh 2008, p.17). Such resistance can be publicly expressed and the driving force for hosting an event, as the roots and early development of Gay Pride celebrations and the Notting Hill Carnival have already indicated.

Other sources of conflict can refer to the political and cultural identity of places. In 1992, the Barcelona Olympics were highly contested and increased the already existing tensions between Catalonia, the region, and Spain, the nation-state (Hargreaves 2000). Whilst the latter intended to showcase Spain as a new, modern and democratic country, the Catalan hosts were keen to use this sports spectacle to promote the region’s culture and claims for autonomy. The Olympics became a catalyst for the conflict between Catalan identity and Spain’s central state. In general, regional festivals have become an increasingly popular conduit for the articulation of identity and an expression of the relationship between people and place. As such, regional festivals play a central role in enhancing regional consciousness, despite the diverse interpretation of the term ‘regional’ and the inherently unstable nature of its celebration. The boom of regionalism is best understood as a response to the processes of globalization that has also led to a considerable increase in celebrations of the nation (Devismes 2014).

In addition to these open conflicts, subversive resistance is a serious concern for the hosts of international events, particularly when the expression of a distinctive identity is not part of the official proceedings. The Black Power salute performed by the two American runners Tommie Smith and John Carlos, gold and bronze medallists, respectively, in the 200-metre race, during the medal ceremony at the 1968 Mexico Olympics was widely interpreted as staging a silent protest against the continued racial discrimination of black people in the United States. However, this overtly political statement also signals and conveys their identification with the Black Power Movement, a sense of racial unity and pride. Due to the worldwide attention and media coverage, the image of Tommie Smith and John Carlos raising their black-gloved fists became part of the lasting legacy of the 1968 Olympics.

In order to avoid such publicity, other event hosts have gone out of their way to make sure that the identity on display does not become blurred. After protracted legal battles, the organizers of several St Patrick's Day parades in the United States were allowed to ban members of the LGBT community from marching in the parades. Such a rejection obviously reinforces a sense of inferiority and deprives a distinctive group, in this case gay Irish expatriates, of the opportunity to proclaim publicly their sense of identity and generate pressure to legitimize their identity. In March 2014, the organizers of New York’s march also banned posters and banners promoting gay rights, which led to a boycott by the city’s mayor, Bill de Blasio, and the Irish minister for social protection, Joan Burton, who had been invited to attend the celebrations.

At the Burning Man festival in Nevada’s desert, ‘radical inclusion’ is one of the most important of ten doctrines that define and shape the annual event. Other principles include self-reliance, self-expression, participation over consumption and sustainability. All of these give the unusual festival a unique identity that defies dominant American values. Although the media frequently portray the Burning Man festival as a huge psychedelic party, a giant rave and a playground for adults, it is much more than that. It is committed to free creative and artistic expression and perceives itself as an experimental, utopian community providing multiple opportunities to escape from everyday life and society and to reflect on alternatives. For one week, 60,000 ‘burners’ construct Black Rock City, which is made up of hundreds of individually themed camps organized around a common concept and identity. Many participants even adopt a new name for the duration of the festival. They explore and develop new identities that overcome the constraints of society and encourage their creative abilities. The Burning Man festival allows individuals to explore and experiment with alternative versions of identity, question taken-for-granted beliefs and overcome the widespread experience of alienation and dislocation. The event creates tribal dynamics that help to build social capital and foster community resilience. As such, the Burning Man festival does not only contest dominant identity discourse but offers a host of opportunities to experiment with alternative narratives and community structures (Chen 2009; Gilmore 2010; Gilmore and Van Proyen 2005; McRae et al. 2011).

Several of the above-mentioned examples have in common that they do not only question, challenge and resist dominant identity discourses but also offer alternatives, publicly promote minority and/or different identities and foster a sense of community among those who experience marginalization, exclusion or dislocation. That also applies to the identity of places as distinctive events, ranging from mega events to small-scale local happenings, which have the potential to shape and modify both identities and perceptions. A striking example of such a global sports spectacle is the 2006 FIFA World Cup that Germany hosted (Biermann 2006; Grix 2006). The Germans succeeded in convincing the rest of the world not only that they could efficiently and systematically organize a big party but also that they, themselves, could have a good time and be fun-loving hedonists. Furthermore, they indulged in a healthy, confident, playful and non-threatening patriotism without the international media reminding them of their infamous twentieth-century history, in particular their Nazi past.

Less known, and certainly not very successful, are North Korea’s multiple efforts to change the country’s image abroad through the hosting of various events. Every two years, North Korea’s capital, Pyongyang, hosts an international film festival that shows movies, features and documentaries. Although many of these are produced in North Korea, over the last ten years, an increasing number of foreign films have been screened. In 2012, the event organizers even installed a vast screen outside the main railway station, which allowed locals to watch a small number of Western films. Considering North Korea's reputation as the most secretive, isolated and totalitarian state in the world, this event was clearly meant to counter this discourse and offer an alternative that shows the country's modern, cosmopolitan side and engagement with other cultures.

All the above-mentioned examples provide evidence that international events, festivals, spectacles and celebrations make a large number of contributions to the construction, consolidation and contestation of social and place identities and provide a forum for expressing, celebrating and challenging identities. As such, events are part of social practice that people engage in to form an identity. They offer a platform for social interaction, which provides an opportunity for identification with or opposition to the identity of other individuals. As the following chapters will show, events, festivals and celebrations bring people together and satisfy their desire to belong. Although the smallest common denominator appears to be a shared interest in the event they have chosen to attend, quite often they have much more in common, which intensifies their engagement with identity issues and strengthens their sense of self.

About this collection: Case studies, communities and controversies

The overarching aim of this book is to offer detailed and critical analyses of identity narratives and communities in the context of selected international events, festivals and spectacles. Therefore, the production, development and contestation of identity discourses and communities are the main concerns. Each chapter has been written with the intention to offer a cutting-edge perspective. Thus, the collection aims to provide a detailed understanding of both theoretical discussions and practical realities. Although the chapters in this volume focus on different events and identity issues, they all share some common academic interests and concerns. Most notable among these is an embrace of social-scientific concepts, theories and methodologies when analysing the development of identity narratives and communities in international events, festivals and celebrations.

The structure of this book is determined by a combination of two factors: the nature of the events under investigation and the associated identity discourses and communities. These guiding principles have led to four distinctive parts, each with a clear thematic focus and several case studies. Following this introduction, Part II is primarily concerned with the intersections of local and social identity discourses (and their contestation), using two examples from the world of European football. Part III contains five case studies. They investigate and interrogate the significance and intersections of international events for places – that is, the cities of Hong Kong and London – and people as national communities in Britain, China and North Korea. The five case studies of Part IV are truly supra-national; two examples even engage with global communities and their sense of identity. All five have in common that the events, the performers, the participants and/or the spectators form, to some extent, cosmopolitan communities.

The subsequent part of this book (Part II) deals with social and local identity discourses and communities. Both chapters focus on the contestation of identity narratives within the world’s most popular spectator sport and investigate conflicts, contradictions and continuities of football fandom in Italy and Germany. Chapter 2 by Mark Doidge deals with the calcio fiorentino in Florence, the most populous and capital city of Tuscany, and the social identity of Italian ultras. Although the calcio fiorentino has become a popular tourist attraction, it is not performed for tourists but is a central and deeply embedded element of local Florentine, masculine culture. This public celebration of a traditional, masculine sporting identity is also central to a related Italian phenomenon, the ultras. Local pride and identity are achieved and performed through ritualistic, thoroughly rehearsed and choreographed, visual and vocal displays at football matches that extol the traditions, history, strength and identity of the club and the ultras community. Within the ultras community and the calcio fiorentino festival, traditions, local connectivity, masculine identity and the notion of rivalry are central themes. Drawing on the work of Émile Durkheim, Victor Turner and Mikhail Bakhtin, Doidge evaluates critically how these diverse sporting events help generate a sense of identity through local connectivity and masculine pride.

In Chapter 3, I focus on the relatively late commodification and commercialization of professional football in Germany that caused conflicts and tensions between different stakeholders. The growing wealth of players, the financial lust of many football directors, the apparent lack of respect for the local community and the blatant commercialism of the industry did not sit well with the fans, as their consistent and systematic resistance over recent decades clearly shows. I argue that their rejection of the modernization of football and fight to preserve and maintain traditional values and cultural practices is not driven by an anti-capitalism agenda but is primarily concerned with community, ownership and identity issues. The chapter further suggests that football culture in Germany at the highest level, that is, in the Bundesliga, is constructed by both commercial interests as well as the defiant and rebellious reaction to it. It also shows that the vibrant terraces not only do provide a colourful backdrop but are an integral part of the multifaceted and commodified spectacle, despite the fans’ resistance and opposition to some of these developments.

Part III of this book is entitled ‘Identity Discourses of Cities and National Communities’ and contains five detailed, topical and contemporary case studies. In Chapter 4, Brian Bridges and Glos Ho explore the Hong Kong Dragon Boat Festival and its contribution to the identity of the participants, spectators, local residents and place. The image of the dragon is culturally important for Hong Kong’s citizens – and for Chinese communities generally – and rituals associated with dragon boats in China date back over 2,000 years. Over the past three decades, this semi-religious festival for fishing communities, including those in Hong Kong, has been gradually transformed into an international sports and tourism event. Bridges and Ho draw on concepts of event branding and identity formation to analyse the contemporary meaning of the dragon boat races and festival. They conclude that major stakeholders in the festival, including both the racers themselves and tourism-related governmental organizations, display differing motivations and interpretations. Tensions appear to exist in the contemporary discourse between cherishing traditional cultures and promoting modernization and commercialization.

Adam Jones’s Chapter 5 offers a critical evaluation of London’s use of the 2012 Olympics as a platform for rebranding the British capital, utilizing Simon Anholt’s City Brand Index hexagon as a conceptual framework and structuring device. He shows that during the bidding process, the repositioning of both the host city and the country involved a considerable shift from historic heritage to modern diversity, youth and multiculturalism. Subsequently, however, the organizers reverted back to many of the more traditional and typical London icons, including royalty, architecture, black taxis and red buses, in order to promote both the city and the event. These rebranding and repositioning endeavours created a number of tensions, in particular between host city and nation. There appeared to be a clash between the desire and need to promote the city of London and, at the same time, enhance the country’s international image and reputation through highlighting what is ‘Great’ about Britain. Jones also suggests that, in the short term, the benefits of hosting the London 2012 Olympics have been unevenly distributed among the various stakeholders.

Chapter 6 by Beth Mudford examines critically the proceedings of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee in 2012 and selected media accounts of this high-profile commemorative event. She discusses the key question whether the Diamond Jubilee celebrations supported the older 'Britannia rules the waves' identity or the modern 'Cool Britannia' image of the country which both the opening and closing ceremony of the 2012 London Olympics portrayed. Mudford also explores the tensions between the two identities and evaluates critically whether the old, traditional sense of identity has been replaced successfully by the new, more contemporary version. Her study is underpinned by Michael Billig's 'banal nationalism' and Benedict Anderson's 'imagined community'. Furthermore, she uses framing theory to analyse the media's portrayal of identity discourses during royal celebrations. The empirical data gathered for this research project suggest that the 2012 Diamond Jubilee celebrations reinforced the old British national identity, although there were some references to the new identity discourse. This was also echoed in the press coverage of the event.

In Chapter 7, Gwang Ok and I analyse the identity narratives in several annual North Korean festivals and celebrations. Sixty years after the end of the Korean War (1950–1953), South and North Korea still proclaim eventual unification of the divided Korean nation as a high-priority political goal and, therefore, continue to nurture, to different extents, a pan-Korean identity among its respective populations. At the same time, both states need to provide their citizens with a distinct national identity, which emphasizes difference and uniqueness. We focus on this delicate balancing act as well as on the distinctive elements and sources that shape North Koreans' sense of being part of a unique national community. All public celebrations are geared towards the state's need to generate and consolidate a sense of membership in a unique political community for all North Korean citizens and express its distinctiveness to the outside world. We conclude that North Korea's political elite clearly favours mass pageants that celebrate uniformity and collectivism, the country's past and present leaders, important historical events and exaggerate the regime's mediocre achievements.

Lu Zhouxiang's Chapter 8 traces China's participation in the World Fairs with particular reference to nation-branding issues and the construction of a distinctive identity. Early World Fairs, held in Europe in the 1850s and 1860s, helped the Chinese learn about and understand the outside world. After the Republic of China was founded in 1912, World Fairs became an important political stage to demonstrate the ‘new’ China’s internal stability, as well as its economic and technological achievements. Lu clearly shows that, since the late 1970s, the communist regime has paid special attention to the World Fairs and tried to use the event to boost the economy, link up with international standards and display China’s successful modernization process. More recently, fuelled by a new era of nationalism, characterized by intense Sino-Western competition, hosting the 2010 World Fair is seen by most Chinese as a means of national restoration, supporting the construction of national identity, economic prosperity and international recognition. He concludes that the 2010 Shanghai Expo reflected China’s increasing economic strength and its ambition of integrating with the world. It marked China’s return to the centre of the international stage after more than 100 years of revolution and radical change.

Part IV of this collection deals with supra-national events, communities and identity discourses and comprises five contemporary and critical case studies. In Chapter 9, Jayne Luscombe deals with the challenging, multifaceted and dynamic idea of Europe. On the one hand, Europe consists of a set of politically, economically and legally interconnected nation-states. On the other hand, Europe is a geographical region bounded by seas to the North, West and South and by the Ural mountain range to the East. Furthermore, Europe can be conceived of as a set of culturally diverse communities with rich heritages that defy politically imposed geographical boundaries. For citizens and communities, Europe, therefore, is a multi-layered, contested and ever-changing construct. Luscombe examines these dynamic, diverse and frequently conflicting attitudes towards ‘Europe’ expressed within two pan-European event series: the European Capital of Culture and the Eurovision Song Contest, with particular reference to identity issues, narratives and discourses. Finally, she concludes that events of this nature are constructed by the political and economic elites to form an identity of Europe, which seeks further integration by nurturing and fostering a shared sense of community, heritage and mutual values.

Andrea Stanton’s Chapter 10 takes us into the Arab world as she examines the development and contestation of the birthday celebrations of Prophet Muhammad. Her study is primarily concerned with the fundamental question as to whether this occasion supports or complicates Muslim identity projects. Five hundred years after Muhammad’s death (632 A.D.), the Shiite Fatimid dynasty that ruled Egypt introduced a new festival that celebrated the birth of this deeply spiritual man. This commemorative event, known in Arabic as the mawlid al-nabi, birth of the Prophet, or mawlid for short, soon spread around the region and through the expanding Muslim world. Yet, from the beginning, the mawlid met with doubt and criticism over two questions: Was it a ‘Muslim’ festival or a ‘Shiite’ festival? Did its observance lead Muslims astray by suggesting that someone other than God should be venerated and, hence, making them guilty of shirk, or polytheism? Since the rise of Wahhabism in the late 1700s and the rise of conservative forms of Salafism in the late 1800s, the Muslim world, particularly the Middle East, has witnessed an increasingly sharp division between those states that sanction the observance of the mawlid and those that question its legitimacy. Stanton’s survey of the states of the contemporary Middle East shows which countries forbid, permit or require mawlid observance. She then maps these findings against the sectarian composition of each state’s population and the outlook of each state’s government, assessing the role that these festivals (or their absence) play in fostering national, regional and/or sectarian identities. Stanton argues that shorter-term events, as much as the everyday rituals of prayer, or the month-long fasting during Ramadan play an important role in knitting together the global Muslim community and also bring to the fore sectarian, interpretive and regional differences among Muslims.

In Chapter 11, Patrícia Soley-Beltran deals with fashion shows. She examines critically models as the embodiment of various identity discourses with particular reference to their status as national icons. She combines cultural history with feminist critique and draws on historical sources, ethnographic research, biographies and auto-ethnographic data from her own experience as a model. Soley-Beltran pays particular attention to the intersections of nationality, ethnicity and class, as well as to the moral qualities and virtues models are expected to endorse. Her chapter outlines selected aspects of the cultural history of modelling and reveals a successive accumulation of meaningful signs that include physical, social, gender, ethnic and national characteristics. She argues that these qualities turn models into complex and multi-layered cultural signifiers. Regularly paraded at high-profile international fashion shows, models embody, glamourize and promote a normative identity that serves and supports consumerism. Their display at fashion shows and contests constitutes a highly visual and very visible form of neo-colonialism. Focussing on the fashion segment in the closing ceremony of the London 2012 Olympics, models are analysed as a form of soft power embodying a cultural self-representation of the British nation, conveying an idealized cosmopolitan identity linked to national pride and distinctive cultural values.
Angela Wichmann's Chapter 12 focuses on identity narratives in the context of the 2011 Gymnæstrada in Lausanne, the purely non-competitive, official world event of the International Gymnastics Federation. She analyses the identity formation processes of the participants and how they express and experience their distinctive sense of belonging. Her chapter considers selected theoretical accounts that deal with the dialogical nature of contemporary identity discourses and those that consider the question whether modern identities are fixed or fluid, stable or fleeting. The chapter draws on the rich and detailed qualitative data of her recent ethnographic study of World Gymnæstrada participants. Wichmann argues that this event provides a unique platform to celebrate a collective, supra-national identity that reveals itself dialogically in both a social and physical sense and is episodic and perpetual. Her research provides interesting insights into the socio-cultural impacts of a largely under-researched international event and reveals rather unique and unusual identity narratives of the participants.

In the last Chapter 13, Michael Williams examines the multidimensional meaning of community and cultural identity in the wider context of U2 concerts. The Irish origins of the musicians have enabled the band to create a distinct identity and community that includes support staff and management. However, Williams's central argument is that attending U2 concerts in conjunction with online activities offers U2 fans more than casual leisure opportunities, commercial entertainment and individual consumer experiences. U2, as a cultural field, provides indispensable opportunities for creating and expressing a distinctive sense of community and cultural identity that is both episodic and perpetual. On the one hand, U2's performances are aimed at global audiences with different socio-economic and cultural backgrounds. On the other hand, U2 concerts bring these diverse audiences together, provide face-to-face communal experiences and generate a sense of belonging and a collective cultural identity. The key source and inspiration for both is the fans' shared interest in the band, their music and their style, and, to a lesser extent, their political visions. Williams further suggests that online communication plays an important role in sustaining this sense of community. The numerous U2-related websites and forums enable fans to be collectively connected to a show and each other and form virtual emotional alliances.

Taken together, the individual chapters in this book offer testimony to the diverse ways in which the analysis and critical evaluation of identity discourses and communities in the context of international events, festivals and celebrations can be approached. These case studies reveal the complexity and contested nature of collective experiences, identity discourses and narratives. Furthermore, the collection demonstrates that it is not only the world of mega sports events that help people to make sense of who they are. Such processes can be found in almost every event setting and should, therefore, continue to feature prominently on the research agenda of those who have a keen social-scientific interest in events, festivals and celebrations as this kind of knowledge makes important contributions to the planning, managing and hosting of events.

Bibliography

